Biodiversity and indigenous people are being damaged by illegal logging, clearing of forests and mining in eastern Indonesia, a coalition of non-governmental organizations said on Tuesday, calling on Indonesia to end the practice. Indonesia has a rare form of rainforest found nowhere else on Earth, the country's second largest, and it is home to some of the rarest mammals and birds, according to the International Union for Conservation of Nature (IUCN). Indonesia has ratified the United Nations' conventions on biodiversity, the rights of indigenous people, and on the protection of the environment. But "about 50 percent of the world's remaining tropical rainforests in Indonesia are under threat of illegal logging, clearing and mining," said Josefien Kertewens of the Green Diamond Coalition, a coalition of about 15 environmental groups. The rainforest's indigenous people are often displaced, land is torn up and rivers polluted as the ecosystem is destroyed for mining and forestry. Indonesia has a mosaic of ethnic groups spread across the archipelago, and these indigenous people are often located near the forests. "Indonesia is a world leader when it comes to respecting the rights of indigenous people," said Rob Kooyman, an official with the country's Ministry of Environment and Forestry. The government has provided an additional $250 million over the past two years to support programs that protect Indonesia's rainforests and the country's indigenous people. Since 2009, the government has purchased more than 700,000 hectares (1.7 million acres) of land to protect forests and boost the income of some of Indonesia's poorest people.
